

0001 PROF. Michael Sandel: Today we turn to Kant's reply to Aristotle.
0002 Kant thinks that Aristotle just made a mistake.
0003 It's one thing, Kant says, to support a fair framework of rights within 0004 which people can pursue their own conceptions of the good life.
0005 It's something else, it's something that runs the risk of coercion, to 0006 base law or principles of justice on any particular
0007 conception of the good life.
0008 You remember Aristotle says, in order to investigate the ideal constitution,
0009 we have first to figure out the best way to live.
0010 Kant would reject that idea.
0011 He says that constitutions and laws and rights should not embody, or 0012 affirm, or promote, any particular way of life.
0013 That's at odds with freedom.
0014 For Aristotle, the whole point of law, the purpose of the polis, is to shape
0015 character, to cultivate the virtue of citizens, to inculcate civic 0016 excellence, to make possible a good way of life.
0017 That's what he tells us in the Politics.
0018 For Kant, on the other hand, the purpose of law, the point of a
0019 constitution, is not to inculcate or to promote virtue.
0020 It's to set up a fair framework of rights within which citizens may be 0021 free to pursue their own conceptions of the good for themselves.
0022 So we see the difference in their theories of justice.
0023 We see the difference in their accounting of law, or the role of a 0024 constitution, the point of politics.
0025 And underlying these differences are two different accounts of what it
0026 means to be a free person.
0027 For Aristotle, we're free insofar as we have the capacity
0028 to realize our potential.
0029 And that leads us to the question of fit, fit between persons and the roles
0030 that are appropriate to them.
0031 Figuring out what I'm cut out for.
0032 That's what it means to lead a free life, to live up to my potential.
0033 Kant rejects that idea and instead substitutes his famously demanding
0034 notion of freedom as the capacity to act autonomously.
0035 Freedom means acting according to a law I give 0036 myself, freedom as autonomy.

0037 Part of the appeal, part of the moral force of the view of Kant and of 0038 Rawls, consists in the conception of the person as a free and independent 0039 self capable of choosing his or her own ends.

0040 The image of the self as free and independent offers, if you think about 0041 it, a powerful, liberating vision.

0042 Because what it says, is that as free moral persons we are not bound by any 0043 ties of history, or of tradition, or of inherited status, that we haven't 0044 chosen for ourselves.

0045 And so we're unbound by any moral ties prior to our choosing them.

0046 And that means that we are free and independent sovereign selves.

0047 We're the authors of the only obligations that constrain us.

0048 The communitarian critics of Kantian and Rawlsian liberalism acknowledge 0049 that there is something powerful and inspiring in that account of freedom, 0050 the free independent choosing self, but they argue it misses something.

0051 It misses a whole dimension of moral life and even political life.

0052 It can't make sense of our moral experience because it can't account
0053 for certain moral and political obligations that we commonly recognize 0054 and even prize.

0055 And these include obligations of membership, loyalty, solidarity, and 0056 other moral ties that may claim us for reasons that we can't trace to an act
0057 of consent.

0058 Alasdair MacIntyre gives an account, what he calls a narrative conception
0059 of the self.

0060 It's a different account of the self.

0061 Human beings are essentially storytelling
0062 creatures, MacIntyre argues.

0063 "That means I can only answer the question 'what am I to do?' if I can 0064 answer the prior question of 'what story or stories do I find myself a 0065 part?'" That's what he means by the narrative conception of the self.

0066 What does this have to do with the idea of community and belonging?

0067 MacIntyre says this, "once you accept this narrative aspect of moral 0068 reflection, you will notice that we can never seek for the good or 0069 exercise the virtues only as individuals.

0070 We all approach our circumstance as bearers of particular social 0071 identities.

0072 I am someone's son or daughter, a citizen of this or that city.

0073 I belong to this clan, that tribe, this nation.

0074 Hence, MacIntyre argues, "what is good for me has to be the good for 0075 someone who inhabits these roles.

0076 I inherit from the past of my family, my city, my tribe, my nation a variety
0077 of debts, inheritances, expectations and obligations.

0078 These constitute the given of my life, my moral starting point.

0079 This is, in part, what gives my life its moral particularity."

0080 That's the narrative conception of the self.

0081 And it's a conception that sees the self as claimed or encumbered, at 0082 least to some extent, by the history, the tradition, the communities of 0083 which it's a part.

0084 We can't make sense of our lives.

0085 Not only as a psychological matter, but also as a moral matter in thinking
0086 what we ought to do without attending to these features about us.

0087 Now, MacIntyre recognizes that this narrative account, this picture of the 0088 encumbered self, puts his account at odds with contemporary liberalism and 0089 individualism.

0090 From the standpoint of individualism, I am what I myself choose to be.

0091 I may biologically be my father's son, but I can't be held responsible for 0092 what he did, unless I choose to assume such responsibility.

0093 I can't be held responsible for what my country does or has done, unless I
0094 choose to assume such responsibility.

0095 But MacIntyre says this reflects a certain kind of moral shallowness, 0096 even blindness.

0097 It's a blindness at odds with the full measure of responsibility, which 0098 sometimes, he says, involves collective responsibility, or 0099 responsibilities that may flow from historic memories.

0100 And he gives some examples.

0101 Such individualism is expressed by those contemporary Americans who deny
0102 any responsibility for the effects of slavery upon black Americans, saying,
0103 I never owned any slaves.

0104 Or the young German who believes that having been born after 1945 means that 0105 what Nazis did to Jews has no moral relevance to his relationship to his 0106 Jewish contemporaries.

0107 MacIntyre says all of these attitudes of historical amnesia amount to a kind 0108 of moral abdication.

0109 Once you see that who we are and what it means to sort out our obligations

0110 can't be separated, shouldn't be separated, from the life histories
0111 that define us.

0112 "The contrast," he says, "for the narrative account is clear.
0113 For the story of my life is always embedded in the story of those 0114 communities from which I derive my identity.
0115 I am born with a past, and try to cut myself off from that past is to deform
0116 my present relationships."

0117 So there you have, in MacIntyre, a strong statement of the idea that the 0118 self can't be detached, shouldn't be detached, from its particular ties of 0119 membership, history, story, narrative.

0120 Now I want to get your reactions to the communitarian critique of the 0121 individualist, or the voluntarist, the unencumbered self.

0122 But let's make it concrete so that you can react to more than just 0123 the theory of it.

0124 By looking at the two different accounts of moral and political 0125 obligation that arise, depending on which of these conceptions of the 0126 person one accepts.

0127 On the liberal conception, moral and political obligations arise
0128 in one of two ways.

0129 There are natural duties that we owe human beings as such, duties of 0130 respect for persons qua persons.

0131 These obligations are universal.

0132 Then, as Rawls points out, there are also voluntary obligations,
0133 obligations that we owe to particular others insofar as we have agreed,
0134 whether through a promise, or a deal, or a contract.

0135 Now the issue between the liberal and communitarian accounts of the self-- 0136 is there another category of obligation or not?

0137 The communitarian says there is.

0138 There is a third category that might be called obligations of solidarity,
0139 or loyalty, or membership.

0140 The communitarian argues that construing all obligations as either
0141 natural duties or voluntary obligations fails to capture
0142 obligations of membership or solidarity.

0143 Loyalties whose moral force consists partly in the fact that living by them 0144 is inseparable from understanding ourselves as the 0145 particular persons we are.

0146 What would be some examples?

0147 And then I want to see how you would react to them.

0148 Examples of obligations of membership that are particular, but don't

0149 necessarily flow from consent, but rather from membership, narrative,

0150 community, one situation.

0151 The most common examples are ones to do with the family, the relation 0152 between parents and children, for example.

0153 Suppose there were two children drowning.

0154 You could save only one of them.

0155 One was your child, the other was a stranger's child.

0156 Would you have an obligation to flip a coin?

0157 Or would there be something morally obtuse if you didn't rush

0158 to save your child?

0159 Now you may say, well, parents have agreed to have their children.

0160 So take the other case, the case of children's 0161 obligation for their parents.

0162 Now, we don't choose our parents.

0163 We don't even choose to have parents.

0164 There is that asymmetry.

0165 And yet, consider two aging parents, one of them yours, the other a 0166 stranger's.

0167 Doesn't it make moral sense to think that you have a greater obligation to 0168 look after your aging parent, than to flip a coin, or to help the strangers.

0169 Now, is this traceable to consent?

0170 Not likely.

0171 Or take a couple of political examples.

0172 During World War II, French resistance pilots flew bombing raids over

0173 occupied France.

0174 One day, one of the pilots received his target and noticed that the 0175 village he was being asked to bomb was his home village.

0176 He refused, not disputing that it was as necessary as the 0177 target he bombed yesterday.

0178 He refused on the ground that he couldn't bring himself-- it would be a

0179 special moral crime for him to bomb his people, even in a cause that he 0180 supported, the cause of liberating France.

0181 Now, do we admire that?

0182 If we do, the communitarian argues, it's because we do recognize 0183 obligations of solidarity.

0184 Take another example.

0185 Some years ago there was a famine in Ethiopia.

0186 Hundreds of thousands of people were starving.

0187 The Israeli government organized an airlift to rescue Ethiopian Jews.

0188 They didn't have the capacity to rescue everyone in Ethiopia, and they

0189 rescued several hundred Ethiopian Jews.

0190 Now, what's your moral assessment?

0191 Is that a kind of morally troubling partiality, a kind of prejudice?

0192 Or as the Israeli government thought, is there a special obligation of 0193 solidarity that this airlift properly responded to?

0194 Well, that takes us to the broader question of patriotism.

0195 What, morally speaking, is to be said for patriotism?

0196 There are two towns named Franklin.

0197 One is Franklin, Texas, and the other is just across the Rio Grande River, 0198 Franklin, Mexico.

0199 What is the moral significance of national boundaries?

0200 Why is it, or is it the case, that we as Americans have a greater

0201 responsibility for the health and the education and the welfare and public

0202 provision for people who live in Franklin, Texas, than equally needy

0203 people just across the river living in Franklin, Mexico.

0204 According to the communitarian account, membership does matter.

0205 And the reason patriotism is at least potentially a virtue, is that it is an 0206 expression of the obligations of citizenship.

0207 How many are sympathetic to the idea that there is this third category of 0208 obligation, the obligations of solidarity or membership?

0209 How many are sympathetic to that idea?

0210 And how many are critical of that idea?

0211 How many think all obligations can be accounted for in the first two ways.

0212 All right, let's hear from the critics of the communitarian idea first.

0213 PATRICK: My biggest concern that if having obligations because you're a

0214 member of something, or because of solidarity, is that it seems that if

0215 you accept those obligations as being sort of morally binding, then there's

0216 a greater occurrence of overlapping obligations, a greater occurrence of 0217 good versus good.

0218 And I don't know if this sort of framework allows us to 0219 choose between them.

0220 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Good, and what's your name?

0221 PATRICK: Patrick.

0222 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: So you worry that if we recognize obligations of membership or 0223 solidarity, since we inhabit different communities, their 0224 claims might conflict.

0225 And what would we do if we have competing obligations?

0226 PATRICK: Yes.

0227 NICOLA: Well, one solution is that we could view ourselves as ultimately 0228 members of the human community.

0229 And that then within that we have all these smaller spheres of that I am
0230 American, or I am a student at Harvard.

0231 And so the most important community to be obligated to is the community of 0232 human beings.

0233 And then from there, you can sort of evaluate which other ones are most 0234 important to you.

0235 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: So the most universal-- and what's your name?

0236 NICOLA: Nicola.

0237 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: So Nicola, you say the most universal community we inhabit, the 0238 community of humankind, always takes precedence?

0239 NICOLA: Yes.

0240 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Patrick, are you satisfied?

0241 PATRICK: No.

0242 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Why not?

0243 PATRICK: It seems rather arbitrary that we should choose the universal 0244 obligation over the more specific obligation.

0245 I might also say that I should be obligated first to the most specific 0246 of my obligations.

0247 For instance, take my family as a small unit of solidarity.

0248 Perhaps I should be first obligated to that unit, and then perhaps to the 0249 unit of my town, and then my country, and then the human race.

0250 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Good.

0251 Thank you.

0252 I want to hear from another critic of the communitarian view.

0253 We have the objection, well, what if goods collide?

0254 Who objects to the whole idea of it?

0255 Who sees patriotism as just a kind of prejudice that 0256 ideally we should overcome?

0257 Yes.

0258 ELIZABETH: Patriotism reflects a community membership that's a given.
0259 I think the problem is that whereas some memberships are natural 0260 narratives, the narrative of citizenship is a constructed one.
0261 And I think a false one because as the river is just a historical accident,
0262 it makes no sense because the lottery of birth threw me into the United 0263 States as opposed to Mexico, that that's the membership that I 0264 should be a part of.
0265 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Good.
0266 And what's your name?
0267 ELIZABETH: Elizabeth.
0268 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Elizabeth.
0269 Who has a reply?
0270 Yes.
0271 SPEAKER: I think in general, we have to ask where do our moral obligations
0272 arise from anyway?
0273 And I think basically there'd be two places from which they could arise.
0274 One would be kin, and another one would be reciprocity.
0275 The closer you are associated to other people, there's a natural reciprocity
0276 there in terms of having interactions with those people.
0277 You interact with the neighbors on your street, with the other people in 0278 your country through economic arrangements.
0279 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: But I don't know and you don't know those people in Franklin, 0280 Texas, any more than you know the people in Franklin, Mexico, do you?
0281 SPEAKER: Presumably you're naturally more connected with the people in your 0282 own country, in terms of interaction and trade, than you are with people in 0283 other countries.
0284 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Good.
0285 Who else?
0286 Go ahead.
0287 RENA: Yeah, I think that a lot of the basis for our patriotism can be 0288 compared to like school spirit or even house spirit that we see here, where 0289 freshman are sorted into houses, and then within a day they have developed 0290 some sort of attachment or a pride associated with that house.
0291 And so I think that we can probably draw a distinction between a moral 0292 obligation for communitarian beliefs, and sort of just a sentimental 0293 emotional attachment.
0294 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Good.

0295 Wait, stay there.

0296 What's your name?

0297 RENA: Rena.

0298 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Go back to my example about the obligation of the 0299 child to the parent.

0300 Would you say the same thing there?

0301 It may or may not be a sentimental tie, but it has no moral weight.

0302 RENA: Well, I mean, I'm not entirely certain that accident in the initial 0303 stages something that will preclude like moral obligations later.

0304 So just because we are randomly sorted into a house, or just because we don't 0305 choose who our parents are, or what country we were born into, doesn't 0306 necessarily mean that we won't develop an obligation based on some type of 0307 benefit, I guess.

0308 Which is sort of--

0309 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: So your obligation to your aging parent, that's greater than to 0310 aging parents around the world, is only because and insofar as you're 0311 repaying a benefit that your parent gave you when you were growing up?

0312 RENA: Yeah, I would say that if you look at cases of adoption, where you 0313 have a biological parent somewhere else that you don't interact with, and 0314 then you have a parent who adopted you, most people would say that if you
0315 had to pick between them, in the case of aging parents, that your obligation 0316 would lie more with the person who raised you and who had exchanges with 0317 you meaningfully.

0318 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: May I ask you one more question about the parent?

0319 RENA: Sure.

0320 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: Do you think that a person with a bad parent owes them less?

0321 RENA: I don't know, because I've never had a bad parent.

0322 PROF. MICHAEL SANDEL: I think that's a good place to end.

0323 We'll continue with this next time.

0324 Thank you.
